preparing to receive these children.

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: Time. Senator Chambers, you may continue.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But since they're not to be educated anyway, what difference does it make? And they sent teachers there with no experience, after promising that the teachers with the experience, with the knowledge and the know-how would be provided. And the school administrator sat back and said, well, not enough of them volunteered, so we don't have them there. I believe it's over 60 percent of the new teachers are in the 22 so-called black academies. Thirty-seven white schools are not troubled by all of the things that I'm talking about--the dislocation, the instability, the inadequacy. And white people are so comfortable with that. And you wonder why there's contention between black people and white people? You all control everything. The schools are segregated by white people's fiat. The administrators in those schools are hand-picked by the white people. The teachers are selected and assigned by white people. The curriculum, such as it is, is put together by white people. The number of textbooks, woefully inadequate, determined by white people. And we see this, and our children see it. And we're supposed to worship white people? Why, that is crazy. You all would have to think I'm crazy if I went along with that and was quiet about it. I can't wait for us to get on LB 305. I've got an article here which I'm going to discuss in more detail when we get on LB 305. One goes back to 1997, which is not that far away, when Marianne Means wrote an article about the troubling trend of resegregation of the schools; a 2000 article that includes comments from a person at Harvard about the segregation that is rising again and the problems that are being engendered thereby--the old thing of black children, Latino children and poor white children being consigned to old dilapidated buildings. You know why it's necessary to have black children, Latino children, poor white children go to school with the better white children? Because white people will take care of their children. They will not want their children in these inadequate buildings. They will not want these incompetent teachers. They will not want mice and rats running free in the building. And, by the way, I read an article the other day
